Dear Brother,

I have hitherto delayed writing in hopes of sharing some of my reasons to the letter I program sent you at my request. I now therefore take my pen to give you my ideas on the subject of resigning my ship.
Every thing I have said has been reported either by word of or by the King through his Majesty's investigation and to enquire into them the Philanipian officer my first lieutenant to be made a captain the acting lieutenant to be confirmed the channel station the Philanipian and all which has uniformly been reported the Gunner belonging to my ship to come out of a third rate to be might be appointed to a first rate to be in a top rate.

Mr. Vintor the Marine Officer applied to me to be appointed with the Adjutant, Quarter Master or any other Post. And Harris was the more eligible candidate.
But to crown all, after my having received my orders and the most positive assurance that I was to return near the End of a winter with some officers together with the Fleet for the summer, an order arrived that after that Parrot to be a subaltern abroad. I was surprised that it is too much. They only in two years give up in the miserable state of dependence I am kept in. when to go it I give up you know. There is always a possibility blood would arise in a certain quarter which would do you no good. Therefore I am afraid we have to do with Lord Howe, the worse it will be. I am in request by your opi-nion whether I am to go abroad or give up. I shall be to satisfy your desire. With a most Obedient Son answer me immediately.

I have lastly received a most important letter from the same, a copy of which I have enclosed, and in consequence of which I have written to him to pay quarterly my allowance into the agents hands. Give to him when you see him. The only news I have to give is that my outfit has cost £1000 instead of £800.

Yours

The signature is written in a highly decorative, cursive hand. It begins with a large, ornate 'W' followed by 'Pitt Rivers' in a similar style, ending with a long, sweeping flourish.
