Long H. Sept. 20. 1810

Mr Perceval, conceiving that your Majesty will have heard of the death of Mr Goldsmith, and be desirous of knowing ^{the cause of it} what effort what that melancholy & shocking event may have produced, humbly acquaint your Majesty that it is universally supposed to have been occasioned by pecuniary embarrassment. Mr Perceval has been assiduously endeavouring to ascertain ~~the~~ ^{the} ~~particulars~~ ^{particulars} of the Dublin Money, which may be offered to hazard from having been in his hands, but from the impossibility of obtaining any intelligence from Mr Goldsmith's house in the course of this day has not been as yet able to acquire a certain knowledge of it. — Your Majesty is aware that Mr Goldsmith has been for many years constantly employed under the Treasury in the sale of the Exchequer Bills, which were issued for your Majesty's naval, military, and Ordnance services. On the Army account it happened fortunately, that no Exchequer Bills were in his hands — But Mr Brevint is sorry to say that on account of the havoc he held Exchequer Bills to the amount of $1,74,000^L$ and about $90,000^L$ on account of the Ordnance —

Whether Mr Goldsmith had or had not applied any of any of these Bills to his own purposes, Mr Brevint was not able, in the course of this day, to ascertain; but he apprehended that such a depenof which as must have been necessary to have urged Mr. Perceval to so rash an act, with in all probability he found to have tempted him to make use of the public money - In this state of things Mr. Perceval has thought it necessary to give up his intention of going into Berkshire, in order that he may be at hand to pursue his Enquiries, and to direct such steps as may be necessary the consequences of this melancholy & disastrous event -

The Consternation occasioned by this event in the City was very great - The Stocks fell as low as 63 - and the premium was at one time down below 10 per Cent discount - The Market recovered however before the close of the day the 3 per Cent were about 64. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the discount upon the loan was about 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ or 8 per Cent -

The King has received Mr. Boscawen's letter and he entirely approves of his remaining in London to endeavor to ascertain the Extent of the Consequences to the Publick which may have resulted from the Misadventurous Death of Mr.
Gods mitt. — Mr. B. hopes that the Publick may not suffer to a large Amount, but he cannot but fear with Mr.
Boscawen that a man who could resort to so rash and horrid an Act would not hesitate to make use of the Publick Money under extraordinary Pretence.

Mrs Percival acquaints your Majesty, that, in consequence of his further enquiries this day into the State of Wexford, on this affair he has found that Wexford hath applied to his own purposes not less than £14,000 of Exchequer Bills - and has left great demands from Individuals against him; but that his property is so extensive that unless the debts, which his failure may occasion, should very much deplete the Fund, there are reasonable hopes that neither the public nor Individuals, who ultimately experience must top - Mr General enclosed in your Majesty's information a State of the Account as made out by his Surveying Master; and has prevailed upon three principal Bankers Messrs Kennington - Baenbrugg - and Brench to examine his Books & see whether the Account is correct - Mr General has had much consultation with the Government & Deputy Secy of the Bank when he is to see again ^{on Monday morning} ~~on Monday~~ when he will have to determine what steps should be taken ^{upon this important subject} - Mr General inclines at present strongly to think, that it will be advisable not to proceed as yet, the consequence of which would be to bring immediately the great Staff of the Public Securities belonging to Mr Goldsmith when distressed with the market; & to do so greatly to depress it & the general consequences and injury of the whole mass out of which the public & Individuals may ultimately lose the profit - Indeed he hardly can foresee the extent of mischief which such an impetuous sale of all these securities might produce - and however great the responsibility may be which he may incur in forbearing to prep for the immediate payment of these debts to the public, he feels that it will be his duty to consider it; ~~and~~ upon further consideration he should continue to see the subject in the light in which it strikes him at present - Your Majesty may rest assured that he will not incur this responsibility but upon the best consideration he can give to the subject, and he is persuaded Your Majesty would ^{scarcely} think him unworthy of the confidence which your Majesty graciously reposes in him, if the dread of such responsibility should ever on occasion when maybe of such positive importance to the public interest, prevent him from taking any steps which the consideration of that interest may appear to him to require

The King is sensible of Mr Berceval's Attention in entering so fully into the Result of his Enquiries into the State of Mr Godsmith's Affairs; & his Majesty entirely approves of every Step which he has taken upon this distressing Occasion, and of the Principle upon which he acts, being aware that a great heap of the Public Securities brought into the Market would by depressing the Funds create general & incalculable Inconvenience. — He is too highly appreciates Mr Berceval's Character & Conduct to think for a moment him shrink from the conscientious Discharge of what he conceives to be his Duty.
