It is impossible for me to be on the eve of such long separation from you & not to express once more my ardent prayers for every blessing to your royal Highness. That anxiety for your welfare will not cease but with my existence.

I leave you, Sir, in a state of affairs more likely to become serious or embarrassing than I think is calculated by those around you.

 Were I asked in what manner the impending troubles are to be surmounted, I would say "The Prince has only to recur to the generosity & magnanimity of his own nature in order to rise above all political difficulties. To cut
