

J. Blaquiere (y.t. Baron) to 38397-8

Dublin 23 July 69

My dear General

at such a crisis, there need no apology - I am writing to a friend, and wish to be guided by better sense than my own.

It is not in human nature to imagine, that under such an accumulation of insult, the prince will be at rest - nor will it be out of the way to suppose, that the people of Ireland may be inclined, to do him better justice - a little wisdom and some management may be necessary, but as best of strength will be derived from the unpopularity of our present

J. Bl

present chief Governor, who is the indignation of true friends of this Kingdom.

The history of our prerogative last Sunday, has no example - nor will it be believed at a future day, that a man whose characteristic bears no extraordinary instances of either manhood or valour, should have the temerity, impudently to call us together, for the purpose of pledging ourselves to support the measures adopted in England, altho' it was impossible at that time for any man living to know, what those measures were - that Lord Buckingham intended us this favour altho' it may be now denied, I do aver - Even on the

Sub=

Salus
gale
ecce
detra
patri
whic
it m prop
his
on agai
to th altho
be a endea
basse
proce

J. Blaquier (aft. Baron) to 38398

the Kingdom.
Saturday, the day day preceding the procegation, his speech from the throne, re-eased back in our address, were points debated by some of those who had the patience to speak on the subject, of which number I was not one. Not was it till the day following (Sunday) that his propositions measure was abandoned by his Excellency.

together,
elves to
in England,
I time
at those ing them
may be on the
Sub=
on the 5th of Feb: then, unless we are again protracted, we shall engage: and to the points of limiting the power of altering the constitution, as they much be added and of which the most will be endeavour'd to be made, that of separating ourselves from England, if we suffer our proceedings to differ from what has been done

done there, and upon which some leading men in this country are pledged, and upon this point it is, that our best questions must issue, for as to the demerits and the injurious insult which it implies, were the question entire to us, which it is not, it would be scouted out of the house — but you are still in time for all you want, and I need fear not the smallest doubt that, with a little common discretion, aided by the unworthiness of the man in whom Mr. Pitt has chose to confide, I mean the managers of Buckingham; you will attain from Ireland, reparation to the

38399

to the injured honor of the prince, & a remedy adopted in the Roman's sight.

These are my principles, and this my creed - inspire me with the latter, & tell me how I can most usefully act, & I shall thank you - and tell me too, my dear General, are any questions from so small a man as myself, likely to be acceptable to the prince - it would make me happy if I could think they were!

I ever am

Your most faithful and affectionate servant

Blaquiere

Why won't the Duke of York, be our Lord Lieutenant!

[Faint, mirrored cursive handwriting, likely bleed-through from the reverse side of the page. The text is illegible due to fading and mirroring.]