London Castle October 18. 1609

My Dearest Mary,

I am glad to learn from your kind letter of yesterday that the weather was considered sufficiently mild to admit ^{your arrival} of her going out in the carriage, and I trust I shall have the comfort of hearing that she derived benefit from the airing. Gray assures me that I should feel very much disappointed in the idea that she should at any time suffer from her attention in writing, and to me, & that while I should lament the cause of her not writing, I should feel very desirous that she should ^{in my account} not ^{use} herself in any business which can give her the smallest additional pain or uneasiness. That I should trust to you for the information which I am so anxious to receive from Weymouth.

Believe me to

Yours

Gray
