My dear D^r. Nott.

Lady de Clifford begs me to write to you to thank you for your kind letter, and to assure you, that every thing respecting the paper you enclosed shall be attended to. As to myself I have nothing to say, but that no care or attention on my part shall be wanting; and that though I dislike Latin, more than anything in the world, yet you may depend upon my learning it with as much good temper as possible: and that, knowing what dislike you have to see what dislike I have, I shall endeavour to smother my own dislike, to endeavour to render it as pleasant to myself as I can by thinking that by so doing I not only give pleasure, and obey the wishes, and orders of my kind Parent, but also that I do what my friends wish. These are my resolutions; and as such I shall remember them; therefore you will have ^{on} no occasion, any need of putting me in mind of what I have just mentioned, as it will act as a spur to me, and sting me (as Prince Bibi's ring did) if I do wrong.

Farewell, Dear Sir, and believe me to be

Your sincere Friend

(signed). Charlotte.
