

Duchess of Brunswick

My dearest brother

Having it from yourself I must be convinced that you are quite recover'd, I have had my doubts tho' William is always so kind as to write when you are ill every post, as he knows what I suffer, & my health is now so bad, that vacation quite overtook me, my Daughter has made me very happy by assuring me that you approve of her conduct if there had been any fault on her side a word from you or the Queen would have put things right in a moment, for I never knew a more obedient & careful, nor a better child than she always was, had he not been blinded by those about him, he could have let her to all sort of imprudences with out that she had found it out, fell too late, but all is turn'd out by your good sleep to my most sanguine wishes, & is the only sure plan for both their future happiness, & for the well

Duchess of Brunswick

Being of the dear little Charlotte, who is a child of too much consequence for that Her Education should be neglected, & by what I hear is a remarkable, forward sensible good Child, the mother likes on her, & that was the bitterest Pill for a mother too diligent not to have a word to say about her Child, not to have her under her roof, had ^{not} all these measures been taken to keep her, she never would have been so popular, which certainly was not ~~meant~~ meant, may I add that the head is not better than the heart, the opposition say so openly, I am quite ridiculous on that subject, for pour Thonneur de la Castille I can not have to hear him abusid, & I have taken it very high in the beginning with the French who presumed at first to take upon that disagreeable subject, it could happen but once, & the Duke & me never mention H R H good nor bad, that's the best thing one can do, & what does the least harm, pray be cautious, not to have a relapse, they say you take too strong exercise and do not drink wine enough, I have got the better of my cramps in the Stomach by drinking a glass of wine in the morning, & two at dinner I have such an aversion to wine that the faces that I make, makes every body laugh I am my dearest brother your most affectionately obedient humble Servant

& Subject
